

since their marriage, four years ago about yesterday.

"Well?"

"I found them both—dead!"

"Describe, please—take your time!—how you found them?"

"I got up about seven o'clock and began my household work as usual. I first brought the papers in from the verandah, and looked to see whether the House had sat late."

"Never mind that. Tell us how you found the bodies?"

"I am coming to that. You see, sir, if the House was sitting, I put breakfast off, and did not take the papers up to Mrs. Baird's room. I saw the House had not sat late, so I was taking the papers upstairs when—"

"What?"

"I had to pass the room in which Mr. Baird used to keep his books and papers and do his writing. The door was open, and I was surprised to see him sitting at the table. The blinds were down, and the lamp, which was still burning, was a dim, so, at first, I thought him asleep—fallen asleep over his reading."

"What did you do?"

"I did not disturb him—I thought he would not like it, so I went up to his bedroom, intending to wake Mrs. Baird so that she might rouse him. I knocked at the room-door, but got no answer, so went in and drew up the blinds. Then I went to the bed and touched Mrs. Baird to wake her. She was dead."

"Describe how you found her?"

"She was lying in bed, just as if she was asleep—just as she has been lying at other times when I have gone in when Mr. Baird has been away from home."

"Were there any signs of disturbance in her dress—the bed-clothes?"

"Were neat and undisturbed—at least, nothing more than ordinary—and I think of it, not so much."

"And she was dead?"

"Quite dead, sir—cold and cold."

"What did you do then?"

"I rushed down stairs to Mr. Baird's room—"

"His study?"

"They did not call it a study. They called it the 'Den.' And when Mrs. Baird was in a teasing humor she would speak of it as 'The Bear's Den.'"

"Ah! And you went to the 'Den'?"

"Yes—to rouse Mr. Baird! I hardly knew what I was doing—I was so startled, but that was my idea, I know!"

"And you found—?"

"That he was dead, too. I remember now I put my hand on his shoulder—"

"Was he lying upright?"

"No, his head was bent on his clasped hands, which rested upon the table. I called him, and shook him, and then I knew he was dead."

"What did you do then?"

"I don't know—for some time I was stupid, dazed."

"Did you faint?"

"I think I did, sir. After a time, I went to the neighbors, and told them. They sent for the police—who have had charge of the house since."

"There was a long pause. Then the coroner asked, with a stident emphasis—"

"What did you do with the chloral bottle—or bottles?"

"The—chloral, sir? The witness was confused for the first time during her examination."

"Yes, the chloral. The medical testimony is that death in both cases resulted from chloral poisoning?"

"It was overdoses, sir, overdoses—I'm sure of it!"

"Ah, how can you be sure of it? But we'll come back to that again. Where are the chloral bottles?"

"No answer. The question was repeated sternly. Still the witness's lips were closed."

"I am going to ask you to open your eyes in a very serious position, witness! The presumption is that you removed the bottle or bottles of chloral before you notified the neighbors. Did you?"

"Outragedly she answered at last: 'Yes—yes! But I'm sure they both took overdoses!'"

"To what place did you remove the drug?"

"I'll go and get them, sir—I will, sir!"

"Where were two bottles, or was there only one?"

"Two."

"Where were they when you first saw them?"

"One on the little table by Mrs. Baird's bed—the other in her hands."

"You removed them before you went for the neighbors?"

"The witness nodded."

"Now—where to?"

"To—my box."

"At the Baird's house?"

"Yes—I'll go and get them, sir!"

"An officer will go with you, Sergeant—"

"Oh, never mind, sir—I'll really bring 'em, I will. The sergeant needn't bother."

"You are in the count's hands, witness. The officer must go with you, or alone. I can empower him to search for the drug."

"I will—go, sir!"

"Before we resume, gentlemen, the examination of the witness Marson, the sergeant of police will testify as to his finding the chloral."

"My name is William Marson. I am a sergeant of police attached to No. 33 Division. Yesterday morning I was placed by Inspector Phillips in charge of this enquiry."

"Upon information received from the doctor, I made search for a chloral bottle or bottles. I was unsuccessful. The previous witness, when interrogated by me, denied having seen them. When ordered by you just now, sir, I proceeded with the previous witness to the Baird's house, and in the room occupied by that witness I found a locked box. The witness Marson unlocked it, just lifted the lid, put her hand in, drew out the two bottles I produce, and let the lid drop again and locked the box instantly. Her hand was in the box less than half-a-minute. From a rustling of paper, it seemed as if she had taken the bottles out of a wrapper. I asked her had she done so; she denied it. I insisted upon examining the box myself. She flung the key through the window, which was open, into the street below, sir, and another to search for the key. The box may or may not contain further evidence bearing upon the case—the inquiry."

"You did right, Sergeant Brady. Stand down now. Jane Marson!"

"What is your objection to having your box examined?"

"Because—"

"The Court is waiting. I must warn you that I will not put up with any further trifling. You have already sought to deceive the Court. Why do you object? Were there any wrappers on the bottles?"

"No, sir, none."

"Then, why do you object?"

Sergeant Brady here whispered to the Coroner.

"The Sergeant tells me the key is found. Sergeant, open the box—"

"Oh, sir, never mind. I'll tell you why, since you must know—I—Mrs. Baird told me sometime ago I was to—have some of the jewelry if she died—and I took it yesterday—and placed it in the box."

"Sergeant, open the box!"

The witness Marson burst into tears.

"Now, witness, no jewelry has been found in that box. Only these two letters, one in an envelope addressed 'Edward' and the other unenclosed, but marked 'Felicia,' were lying upon the top of your clothes! Bearing in mind that the deceased Mr. Baird's Christian name was Edward, and Mrs. Baird's 'Felicia,' how do you explain the presence of these letters in your box?"

"No answer."

"For some reason or other, witness, you are endeavouring to deceive the Court. You have made statements that are misleading, as well as others that are directly false. I might commit you for perjury—I might even cause your arrest on suspicion of having murdered Mr. and Mrs. Baird—"

"I murder them! That is good! Why, I was too fond of them both!"

"Then why seek to prevent the course of justice? This lady and gentleman may have been murdered."

"No—it was an overdose to each!"

"That is the third time you have made that statement. It implies a specific knowledge of how they met their deaths. What do you mean?"

"Oh, with a sudden blaze into a paled wrath, 'If you must know, read the letters!'"

"Before I read the letters I wish you to prove they bear on the inquiry. You found the letters, where?"

"The one in the envelope on Mrs. Baird's table under the chloral bottle, the other between Mr. Baird's fingers."

"Then you removed them at the same time that you removed the chloral bottles?"

A motion of assent.

"Why?"

"No answer."

"Was that before you called in the neighbors, or after?"

"Before!"

"The jury will please listen closely. This letter is evidently written by the male deceased, and the witness Marson has now proved that it was taken from his hand—"

Midnight.

Sweetheart,—To-night, at dinner, I made up my mind to adjust finally our relations. How, I did not then see. It was only during the course of a debate in the House that the solution of our difficulties to which I have come suggested itself. And that is, dearest—my death. I love you so well that I can give up fame for you by giving up life; and yet, somehow, I do not love you well enough to subject myself to the daily torture of living with a woman who has no sympathy with my toils, with my aims, with my dreams— who stabs me daily with her desires to understand me no less acutely than she wounds me with her misunderstandings. We have tried now for four years to get closer to one another—and yet we are never so close as when we arrive at the point of mutual toleration. I'll love you less, life with you would be easier. If you loved me less you would be happier; but as with all our constant friction our passion seems to become the stronger—I love you more and more. I feel that the dawning of each day, while it throws open a new treasury of affection, in the same moment widens the current of bitterness that divides while uniting us. Men say I have a right, but the reason of this severance in regard to this love is a delight to me, there are frequent moments when your voice is a blow, your manner, even your caress, an outrage. Never otherwise than loving and tender; ever anxious to understand me and to forestall my wants, there is in you some fatal element of incapacity, or, in myself, some dreadful unreasonableness, some terrible craving that has its roots in brutal selfishness. And so, dearest, I think it best to spoil your life no longer. The fault is not yours—but in me—or the perverse nature of things. You will find my affairs in order, my insurance policy is indefensible, even by a guide. And others beside you know that I am a chloral drinker. The empty bottle, following upon an excited night in Parliament, will be sufficient explanation to the world. When you wake in the early morning and miss me from your side, you will come down to the Den and find this in my hand. Keep it to yourself, beloved—and the sole explanation the world will receive will be 'an overdose of chloral.' To-morrow the town will give a start of mild surprise—and in the next moment, forget 'the rising public man.' Do you, sweetheart, forget me, if not as soon, at least soon—E.

"Here, then, gentlemen, we have an explanation of Mr. Baird's death—we cannot yet say whether it is the true explanation. I now turn to the letter found according to the witness Marson by the dead lady's bedside. This, unlike the other, is enclosed in an envelope which I open. It runs so—"

10 o'clock.

My Darling Husband,—It was borne in upon me to-night, after our difference at the dinner-table, that the one way open to me to prove my love to you, to leave you free to obey the impulse of your great talents. On all hands I hear you spoken of with admiration, and the very strength of the criticism you and your speeches call forth, I am told, is a tribute to your prowess, though the bitter words pain me like a blow. And it is this that convinces me I should leave you. If I were cleverer or wiser I should, perhaps, understand better how it is, and why it is, you, only a simple woman, who has no power but that of loving, while I boast of so, I resent the censure, and I feel it so. It must be one of those things which you so often tell me I can't understand. And it seems to me, dearest, that is the root of all our discord—that I can't understand you, or your motives, or your mode of work. I strive honestly to do so—I read, and I try to think, but I cannot do what I will, feel an interest in these political things which interest you and fascinate you. I would not for a moment suggest you are wrong, but sometimes I fancy you do not see the difference between a man who has countless interests outside of his home and a woman who has none. I am only a woman, who can do anything except love, at all, pray, and keep house, things with which men have no sympathy that lasts long. Not that your love has no sympathy that lasts long. I am going into the Dark—but it is not dark utterly, for your love is so strong that it will light me across the grave. What I mean is that, to me, love is supreme; to you, your ambition is the one thing which you would not part with. . . . But why should I write thus? I don't know—except it is—oh, dear, this heart that will not beat much longer, yet beats quicker at the thought!—that my words may induce you to make sure of your self, and of Mrs. Baird, should you take another wife to your home! Dearest, let her understand you—or, at least, do you understand her! Blind not another weakling to your strength, no other poor, ignorant soul with no talent, but that of loving to her greatness. Heaven knows that I have striven to be worthy of you—to bring myself to the level of your judgment! Yet, that I have failed I know. You bade me be honest always—never to affect a knowledge that I had not. Well, I've been that—I have confessed my ignorance—and when you have not burst out with your prior contempt, you yet—know, all the more acutely from pity for my silliness. And so, dear, thinking this way, I will no longer say the way to your ascent. If I had brains, they should be as wings to my heart; and I hug this thought to my heart that my love can do for you what my intellect cannot. For it is my love that prompts me to die

Or you dearest, dearest husband. It is my love that bids me lay my life at the feet of your fame. —God be with you ever, Felicia.

"That is the poor lady's letter, gentlemen—"

"There is a postscript over the page, sir!" said a jurymen.

"Ah! I did not see that. It completes the evidence, gentlemen. Listen—"

P.S.—I have taken the contents, 11 p.m., of one of your chloral bottles. Say, dearest, that I was in the habit of taking the drug—only Jane will know that was not so. I will leave this so that you will see it when you come from the House. Be sure, dearest, and keep it to yourself. The world must not know. And you, Ned, you will never know how much I loved you!—Your F.

"Gentlemen, these letters sadly simplify our duty."

"I wish to ask the witness Marson one question, Mr. Coroner," said a juror.

The witness was recalled.

"Did your master and mistress ever quarrel?"

"Mr. and Mrs. Baird never quarrelled outright. He would say sharp words, but almost instantly beg her forgiveness."

"How—can you remember an instance?"

"One night he was waking up and down the room, looking as if his thoughts were far away. She read out to him some paragraph from a paper—a funny paragraph. He stopped in his walk—and damned her. Her baby prattle, he said, had made him lose grip of the finest thoughts he had had for many a day. A few moments later he craved her pardon."

"What a pair of fools!" muttered a jurymen, with pendulous fatness of cheeks and white-vested complacency of bed.

"Fools!" repeated the witness. "Fools! Who are you to think you understand? Why, perhaps you thought I was committing perjury for the love of it, and not for the love of them! Fools!"
